The Random Jottings of Donald Jay in Nelson in Pendle Lancashire .

Butter Makers Location Worsthrone - Jam Hole Well Fairies and other little folk would use this area to churn their milk into butter. Once upon a time, in the heart of the enchanted forest of Worsthrone, there was a small village of fairies and other little folk. They lived in harmony with nature, and every day they would go about their daily chores with joy and cheerfulness. One of their favorite activities was making butter, and they would gather at the Jam Hole Well to do so. The Jam Hole Well was a magical place, filled with the purest and most refreshing water. It was said that the water had the power to make anything taste better. And so, the fairies would bring their milk to the well and churn it into the creamiest, most delicious butter. The fairies took great pride in their butter-making skills, and they would spend hours churning and chatting away. They would sing songs, tell stories, and share gossip as they worked. The sound of the churns and the laughter of the fairies echoed throughout the forest, bringing joy to all who heard it. One day, a group of humans stumbled upon the Jam Hole Well. They had been lost in the forest and were desperate for water. When they saw the fairies churning their milk, they were amazed. They had never seen anything like it before. The humans watched in awe as the fairies worked, and they couldn't help but wonder if they could make butter too. The fairies, always welcoming of new friends, showed the humans how to churn the milk and make butter. They taught them the secret to making the creamiest butter, and soon the humans were churning away. From that day on, the humans would visit the Jam Hole Well regularly, bringing their milk to make butter alongside the fairies. The fairies and the humans became great friends, and they would spend their days together, churning butter and sharing stories. The Jam Hole Well became a place of friendship and unity, where fairies and humans worked together in harmony. And although the location of the well is lost in time, the legend of the butter makers lives on, inspiring generations to come together and share in the joy of creating something beautiful.

By Donald Jay